Not the right ventricle: the basis for many syndromes involving the left heart. As the form of human left heart disease has changed, so has the diagnostic approach to these patients. At first, left heart disease was perceived as being due to the presence of akinetic ventricular septal wall with or without right ventricular pressure overload. With the introduction of echocardiography, left heart disease is viewed as being due to a loss of function of the left ventricle, with or without some degree of right ventricular pressure overload. Patients are being evaluated for the presence of a right ventricular pressure overload with or without left ventricular dyssynchrony or dysfunction. They are also being evaluated for the presence of apical and nonapical left ventricular dyssynchrony, as well as the presence of both right and left ventricular pressure overload. It is our impression that these problems are so difficult to diagnose and so multifactorial that we have a long way to go to understand the proper diagnostic approach to these patients. In the future, some of the problems that we are discussing here will be resolved by using newer echocardiographic techniques. Perhaps some of the reasons for the current difficulty in evaluating these patients will ultimately become less relevant.□□◆
